1. ARCTIC: Drilling delays aren't slowing Shell's Alaska pipeline work

WAINWRIGHT, Alaska -- On Sunday evening, a crew of scientists pulled their gear from the belly of a small plane in this Arctic village, climbed into a pickup truck and headed down the gravel road to town. Over the next two weeks, the six aquatic researchers will be studying marine life along Wainwright's Chukchi Sea shore and in the inland Wainwright lagoon. Their research, funded by Royal Dutch Shell PLC, will be fed into an environmental impact statement the company must submit to federal regulators before building a local oil pipeline. At a time when construction delays and sea ice have hampered Shell's plans to explore for oil this summer in the Chukchi and Beaufort seas, the Wainwright science studies are proof of the company's fundamental faith in the oil potential of its Arctic offshore leases.
